

Course Information Sheet for entry in 2016-17

MSt in Japanese Studies

About the course

This one-year, taught graduate course aims to recruit students with a good undergraduate degree in Japanese, or graduates with equivalent language skills in Japanese and knowledge about Japan. You will study towards acquiring a solid specialisation within Japanese studies, including research methods and practice.

Based on your ability to use primary and secondary sources in Japanese, and your general knowledge about Japan and Japanese studies, you may expect to acquire a solid specialisation within Japanese studies, including research methods and practice within that specialisation. The course is designed around the academic expertise of academic staff in Japanese in the Oriental Institute, presently linguistics and literature. A core element of the course, within each line of specialisation, is detailed work with bodies of data (usually textual in the widest sense) within some methodological framework.

The specialisation you can acquire in the course can stand alone as a qualification for a professional career, or it can serve as preparation for pursuing a research degree, here at Oxford, or elsewhere.

Subject to availability of teaching, the course has specialised tracks in the areas of linguistics, modern literature, classical literature, and another subject at the discretion of the Board of the Faculty of Oriental Studies. You should specify which track you are applying for, and admission is to a specific track. Once admitted, you will only in exceptional circumstances be permitted to change track.

The teaching for the course is structured around four 'papers' (examinations) that are specific to a specialised track, with each paper contributing one quarter of the final mark. The teaching will be organised differently for each respective track and most teaching is track-specific. A considerable amount of self-study is also required, particularly for Papers II and IV.

For Paper I, the context, background, and history relevant to the track chosen are studied. Teaching will take place in lectures and/or seminars, and will include reading secondary texts in English (or other European languages) and to a smaller extent in Japanese. Examination will be by two essays (each max. 2,500 words) written in the first (Michaelmas) and second (Hilary) terms of the course. Essay topics will be track-specific.

For Paper II, texts relevant to the track chosen are studied. Teaching will take place in small classes and/or tutorials, but texts will also need to be studied independently. Examination will be by a three hour written exam, with translation and comment from the texts offered, taken at the end of the third (Trinity) Term.

For Paper III, the theory and methodology of the track chosen is studied, preparing students for independent research. Teaching will take place in lectures and/or seminars, to some extent backed up by tutorials. This paper will be examined by a 3 hour written exam at the end of Trinity Term.

Paper IV is a dissertation of no more than 15,000 words in proper scholarly form, submitted during Trinity Term. The choice of dissertation topic will be made in consultation with your supervisor. It is important to start thinking about and working on the dissertation early. Generally, supervision and guidance for the dissertation will take place in Hilary and Trinity Terms. A dissertation workshop will be held for all students early in Trinity Term.

Finally, you may be examined by oral examination unless you are individually excused by the examiners.

For further information on the examination procedures for the MSt Japanese Studies, please consult the Course Handbook, which can be accessed via the faculty's course webpage.
